HealthPROSe Brings Creative, Strategic Thinking to Health Blogosphere AAHC President Wartman adds commentary from academic health center perspective

WASHINGTON, July 14 - The Association of Academic Health Centers (AAHC) announces the launch of HealthPROSe, a blog by seasoned health and policy professionals that can provide a new and trusted voice on health policy and related socioeconomic issues. HealthPROSe brings creative thinking to the health debate with engaging, focused commentaries on national and global health policy concerns.

Those blog audiences who are not only interested in exchanging ideas, but also in gaining an understanding of how the nation's health system operates and the academic health center infrastructure supports the delivery of the nation's health care services, will want to visit and comment often. HealthPROSe breaks new ground as its authors address health professions education, biomedical research, and the integrated nature of health care delivery, and as they call for strategic thinking and look to long-term solutions for health issues.

AAHC President and CEO Steven A. Wartman, MD, PhD, MACP, and AAHC Vice President for Policy and Program Elaine Rubin, PhD, offer reporters, policymakers, and the public credible information and sound commentary and analysis as they address the significant connections of the health workforce and biomedical research with health care delivery today.
